This recovery or memory is made up by the access of past information stored in our memory. These memory processes were classically studied with a list of words or images that the subject had to memorize and later remember. Recognition- Cognitive Ability This chapter examines the limits of the emancipatory aspirations found within liberal criminal law, through a discussion of the challenges posed to the liberal model of criminal law by terrorism. It engages primarily with Antony Duff's communicative theory of punishment and with his discussion of the criminalization of terrorism, relating the notion of communication with the Hegelian ... Retrieving Subjectivity: Criminal Law, Terrorism, and the ... The University of Chicago Press. Books Division. Chicago Distribution Center
